Dear Mr. Pares,

The quote that you referred to in your letter faxed to me on January 26, 2001 that "to the guys of Imperial Consolidated the benefit of the doubt cannot be given them and the reality is that behind his educated, effeminated and courteous outward appearance hides dangerous people extremely" is not structured in proper English and, to be frank, is too erratic in structure for me to comment on properly. I can categorically state that I did not utter this sentence as you have translated it but that might be because the translation is so poor.

I will confirm that I did not use the term "extremely dangerous" when describing the Imperial Consolidated Group to the author of the article during a meeting in Miami.

I request that you conduct future correspondence in English, which is my natural language, the official language of the United States, where I am located and where my meeting with this journalist took place, and also the natural language of the Imperial Consolidated group, which is headquartered in England.

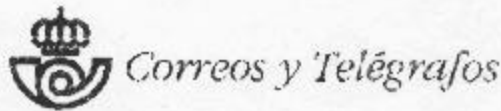

Sincerely,

David Marchant
